Lens options: Definitions and recommendation guidelines

This glossary is to help you understand the types of coatings, lenses and materials that are listed as your lens options.

Coatings

Anti-reflective (AR) coating: A coating that is added to lenses to reduce reflection, glare and smudges and help sharpen vision in all lighting conditions. Some AR lenses also filter blue light when you use electronic devices. There are 4 tiers of AR coatings available—each tier offers a different level of scratch and glare resistant protection, with Tier IV giving the highest level of protection, including features to help keep your glasses cleaner. Recommended for everyone; this is the second most popular item people add to their glasses.

Photochromic: Lenses that darken when they are exposed to unfiltered sunlight and lighten when indoors. Recommended for people who don't like switching between prescription glasses and prescription sunglasses. Photochromic lenses also help protect your eyes from UV and blue light.

Standard scratch coating: Protects against scratches on your eyeglass lenses. This is included on the majority of lenses at no additional charge to you.

Tint: Adds color to your lenses, most commonly to transform your prescription lenses into sunglasses. In addition to shading the eyes, tint can be used to reduce glare and improve contrast. Recommended for people who want their sunglasses to include their prescription.

UV coating: Offers protection for your eyes against UV light (sunlight that's harmful to you).

Lenses

Progressive: Sometimes called "no-line bifocals" because they don't have bifocal or trifocal segment lines. Progressives are designed to help your eye transition between near and far distances, similar to what the eye does naturally. There are 5 tiers of progressive lenses on our lens options list. Each tier offers different levels of technology. Tier I is the most cost-conscious option and typically used for those getting their first non-lined bifocal, where Tier V includes lenses that provide more natural-feeling vision. Higher tier progressives often provide a smoother transition for your near-to-far field of vision. Recommended for people who need bifocals but don't want visible lines in their glasses.

Enhanced single vision: These all-day wear lenses are enhanced to address the demands of a digital-heavy lifestyle. This type of single vision lens has an optimized design that may help prevent eye strain associated with increased screen time and digital device use. Many of these lenses also have properties that filter harmful blue light, and often require the addition of an AR coating. Members receive a 20% discount at most providers on these lenses. Discuss with your provider if these lenses may be right for you.

Materials

High-index lenses: These lenses are thinner than other lens materials—reducing lens weight and thickness—and offer UV protection for your eyes. Recommended for people with higher prescriptions who want thinner, lighter lenses.

Polarized: Help filter reflected light that is traveling in a horizontal rather than vertical direction, providing additional glare reduction. Polarization is popular in sunglasses and available in many non-prescription sunglasses sold in stores. Members receive a 20% discount at most providers. Recommended for people who are light sensitive, spend lots of time driving, or enjoy water activities like skiing, boating and fishing.

Polycarbonate: Made from a thinner, lighter material that offers better impact resistance than regular plastic lenses. This material is the most commonly selected lens option. Polycarbonate lenses also offer UV protection for your eyes. Polycarbonate lenses for dependent children are offered to you at no additional charge. Recommended for children or people who play sports.
